Another major finding is that Scarlett is constantly on Austin's mind like constantly , 24/7. She appears in his thoughts throughout the day, no matter what he's doing. This level of mental presence strongly suggests deep emotional attachment and affection.

Perhaps most importantly, Austin's love for Scarlett is unmeasurable. Attempts to define its size or limit fail completely. It does not decrease over time, it does not depend on circumstances, and it does not appear to have an upper boundary. Scientists involved in this study eventually stopped trying to measure it and simply wrote "a fuck ton" in their notes.

Dessert-Based Evidence

A particularly compelling piece of evidence comes from Austin's willingness to bring Scarlett tiramisu whenever she wants it. This demonstrates responsiveness, care, and a readiness to act purely for her happiness As well as showing Scarlett's intense love for tiramisu ( cant hate on it tho tbh ) . Dessert-based love indicators are widely regarded as some of the most reliable.

Expert Opinions

Several highly respected (and definitely real) professors were consulted during this study:

Professor Claudio Whiskerton, Department of Relationship Studies:

"After reviewing the evidence, I can confidently say that Austin loves her more. It's very obvious."

Dr. Mittens O'Furrell, Senior Lecturer in Emotional Behavior:

"Yes, he loves her more. The consistency alone makes this clear."

Professor Isaac Mewton, Visiting Scholar of Love Dynamics:

"I see no scientific reason to doubt it. He loves her more."

Their independent conclusions all align.

Hypothetical Scenario: Cat Transformation

To test the durability of Austin's love, researchers considered a hypothetical situation in which both Austin and Scarlett transform into cats. Even in this form, evidence suggests that Austin would still choose Scarlett, still care for her, and still love her more—now just with additional whiskers and naps. This confirms that his love transcends form, logic, and species.
